I am yet to fully appreciate the 30-second connect feature. I am also amazed by how I find 50 DNG files listed in the Lightroom catalogue even though I have not imported them there. The development in Lightroom, in all honesty, is still slow. It feels like a slow development of another application that I once used, where some extra features were added over the years, only to force me to move on. Needless to say, I am a bit wary of the fact that Lightroom 5 is a beta version, and that I may have some software glitches in the next couple of weeks when the final version of the product comes out. As has been reported elsewhere in the review, the new HDR and VR options are not presently solving real problems. The "Radial Blur" tool still doesn't work for me. The "Add Missing SR suffers from banding issues. For HDR, I might use View Merge, but I am not sure whether to generate a new HDR from our captures or use ViewMerge to merge our three captures into a single HDR. Since I am mostly interested in post-production, I have not enabled HDR on the D800. Photo management software has hit a bit of a snag. With software like Lightroom, we get a level of customization that no other type of software really offers. The function of a good photo editing software is to be able to manipulate all types of images efficiently, and it doesn't have to be very complex in that process. It must also be able to handle all sorts of image collections, developed with different image-types. Lightroom definitely excels in these categories. Unfortunately for me, it is not suited for the whole range of tasks that I use a photo editing software for.
